THE following poetic Legend, now first printed, is contained in MS. Bibl. Cotton. Titus D. xviii. a small quarto volume in Gothic characters upon vellum. Among other contemporaneous works bound up with it in the same volume are two homilies, and a copy, wanting the beginning, of "Institutiones Monialium Ordinis S^u Jacobi, veteri lingua Anglicana;" from another copy of which, Nero A. xiv. passages illustrating the present work are quoted in the Notes and Glossary. The various readings are from MS. Bibl. Reg. 17. A. xxvii. a small quarto volume in Roman characters; in which are also the Legend of St. Margaret, and that of St. Juliana, both of which are quoted in the Notes and Glossary, and, if we may judge from the repeated use of the same expressions and similar turns of thought in each, seem not unlikely to have been written by the author of the present work.

Who the author was, the Editor has not been able to discover. The language is apparently that of the reign of Stephen or Henry II, and may be termed Semi-Saxon, as exhibiting the intermediate state of the English, when passing out of the pure Anglo-Saxon into the more mixed form in which it appears, two hundred and fifty years later, in the writings of Gower and Chaucer. The MS. in both copies is written continuously as prose, without any graphic marks to distinguish it as a poetical composition; that such is, however, its character, is sufficiently manifest from the style, and the almost constant use of alliteration. The latter is, indeed, in many places very imperfect; the work being evidently remodelled from an Anglo-Saxon original, at a period when the ancient mode of versification was beginning to be laid aside, and to give way to the fashion of rhyming, introduced by the Norman minstrels. The substitution of words the same in sense, but dissimilar in sound, for such as had become obsolete, would break the regularity of the verse, which appears to have been further defaced by interpolation and periphrasis. Still, as in some ancient building mutilated and disfigured by modern alterations, enough remains of the original fabric to show what it must have been in its pristine state.

With regard to the story here narrated, the question arises, how far it is to be believed as true, or to be regarded as a fiction. Such a question could hardly have suggested itself in the age when the Legend was written. From a remote period, the lives of saints and martyrs were usually recited to the people in churches, and sometimes even sung, at the annual festivals instituted to commemorate their virtues and sufferings; and in an age when, through ignorance of the laws of nature, many ordinary occurrences appeared supernatural, men were little inclined to doubt the reality of the events and circumstances, however marvellous, recorded of persons of acknowledged sanctity. The writers of the legends did not hesitate to claim for them the credit due to the most clearly established facts;¹ and it is allowed that, in general, they narrate the history, however mixed with fable, of real persons and events. It is, at least, certain that they frequently mention incidentally facts and circumstances that tally with and confirm the accounts of genuine history; but, in course of time, many absurd and extravagant fictions having been added to the original narratives, their credit declined, and at last sunk so low, that the very name of Legend commonly suggested the idea of a tale transgressing equally the bounds of truth and credibility. It is indeed a received opinion that not a few of this class of compositions are wholly fictitious; and it has been contended, not without an appearance of reason, that the story now under consideration is among this number. In support of this opinion it is observed, that St. Katherine is not mentioned in the works of any contemporary writer. The different narrators of her life are not even agreed whether Maxentius or Maximinus was the tyrant who put her to death.² The most approved account, and which agrees in most particulars with the present Legend, is that which was compiled, or translated into Latin from some more ancient narrative in Greek, by Simeon, surnamed Metaphrastes, about the beginning of the tenth century. According to this writer, Katherine was the daughter of the Emperor Constantius, and suffered under Maxentius. From this it would follow that she was sister to Constantine the Great. By other legendary writers she is said to have been a grandchild of Constantius, being the daughter of his son Costus, who by right of his mother succeeded to the throne of the kingdom of Armenia, and, by marrying a princess of Cyprus, became king of that island likewise, and founded a city there, called from him Fama Costi, afterwards Famagosta. But authentic history is silent concerning this royal personage: and it may, therefore, be conjectured that his name, Costus, is merely an abbreviation of Constantius. Of this prince it is related, that, after the death of his first wife, he married Helen, or, according to another account, Cleir, daughter of Coil, or Coel, a British king, who reigned at Colchester.¹

The most celebrated transaction in the life of St. Katherine, and perhaps as impudent a fiction as any in the whole legendary mythology, is the story of her marriage with the divine Saviour. We are told that the Virgin Mary appeared to an aged anchorite named Adrian, and commanded him to go to Alexandria and invite the Princess Katherine, in her name, to accompany him to his hermitage in the desert, where she would see and be united in marriage to that heavenly King, for love of whom she had refused the love of the numerous earthly kings who had solicited her hand. The venerable messenger obeyed, and, having arrived at the palace, miraculously obtained access to the princess in her private study, where he told his errand; which she no sooner heard than she joyfully agreed to accompany him to the appointed place. When they reached the desert, and were near the confines of his cell, the hermit could not recognise his humble abode, and began to be in great trouble, thinking he had lost his way; but, when he had uttered a fervent prayer, he looked up, and beheld "the most glorious mynster that ever man saw;" and heard a marvellous melody of voices of saints and angels. Here they were welcomed by the blessed Virgin, who told Katherine, that, as she had not been baptized, she was not yet fit to come into her Son's presence. Upon this "there appeared in chyrche a fonte solemnly arrayed with all that long thereto: and the blessed Virgin called Adrian, and bade him baptize her daughter, and not to change her name, for, said she, Kattryne she shall hyght, and I shall hold her to you myself. And with this Adrian waxed as blind as he had never seen afore; and then he was a sorry man, but nought he dorste saye. Then our Lady unclathed this young Queen Kattryne, and brought her to Adrian, and he baptized her; and our Lady named her Katteryne. And she clothed her again, and by that time had Adrian his syght as well as before. The Virgin then led the joyful maiden into the queyr; and, as they entered in, so great a sweetness come agaynst them that it passyd all herts to thynk it. And with that she beheld the semliest yong kyng stondyng atte the anter, crownyd with a ryall crowne, havyng aboute hym grette moltitude of angelys and saynts."¹ Then the Virgin, with much reverence, presented Katherine to her blessed Son; and, after suitable discourse, he led her to the altar, and said, "I take you here, Katteryn, to my spouse, behottying youe trewly never to forsake you whylls youre lyffe lastethe; and after this lyffe I schall bryng youe to an endelesse lyffe, where ye schall dwell with me in blisse withoute ende." With this he put a ring on her finger, and bade Adrian "doo on his vestements, and goo to masse, and saye the servyee over them, as belongethe to the costome of weddyng."¹ When the ceremony was ended, Katherine fell into a swoon; and when she recovered her consciousness, she found herself in the cell of the aged hermit, and the glorious scenes she had passed through would have seemed to her as a dream, if she had not found the ring still on her finger. — This monstrous fable, which is not recorded in the more aneient and genuine lives of the Saint, appears to have been built on the slight foundation of some expressions in the present Legend² similar to those usually applied to nuns when they make their profession, who are said, in a mystical sense, to be espoused to Christ.

The present narrative is, indeed, remarkably free from the more gross and puerile absurdities that too often deform works of this kind. The story is told in an earnest and unaffected manner, that arrests and fixes the attention. It contains noble and generous sentiments, and exhibits examples of enduring courage and faithful piety. The spirit of the dialogue, and the interest excited by the characters and incidents, are such as might have recommended it as a fit subject for dramatic composition. Warton, from Matthew Paris, informs us that Geoffrey Abbot of St. Albau's wrote a miracle play on the story of St. Katherine.¹ Dryden, who speaks of a French play on the same story, has made it the subject of one of his rhyming tragedies, "Tyrannick Love, or the Royal Martyr;" but in the construction of the plot he has departed considerably from the original narrative.

In presenting this volume to his associates of the Abbotsford Club, the Editor will be gratified if it should be considered by them to be of any value as a contribution towards the history of the English language and literature. With the view of rendering it more useful, he has given a translation of the Legend, and a Glossary of the more obscure words, pointing out most of the places where they occur, and enabling the reader to discover their meaning by pointing out their etymology, wherever he has been able to trace it, or by adducing quotations from other works of the same age. Notwithstanding the pains he has taken with the work, he is afraid it will not be found to be free from inaccuracies and imperfections. Its defects would have been greater if he had not been assisted by the valuable suggestions of his friends Benjamin Thorpe, and Joseph Stevenson, Esqrs. to whom he begs leave to express his sincere thanks; and also to Mr. John Fehon, for his vigilant care and useful hints while the work was passing under his eye as Corrector of Mr. Bentley's Press.

The engraving on the title-page is copied from a drawing in MS. Bibl. Reg. 2. B. vii. fol. 284, apparently executed about the beginning of the fourteenth century.

War, after a while, grew between them, and they come to battle. Maxence was overcome, and fled into Alexandria. Constantine would pursue, and drive him out thence. But so wide grew the war on every side, and especially in a country called Illyria, that he stopped there. When Maxence heard this, as he was secure respecting him, and in no anxiety about his coming, he made himself king of that country, which was subject to Rome, as was almost all the rest of the world. But, though she was young, she maintained her parents' household wisely and warily in the heritage and in the hall³ that came to her by birth: not because in her heart it seemed to her good to have many under her, and be called Lady, that many highly esteem: but she was afraid both of shame and of sin, if they were dispersed, or evil befel them.

turned their wiles upon themselves, that they all acknowledged themselves craven and overcome, and yielded her entirely the mastery and the honour. Thus while she guarded herself, and thought ever to keep herself a maiden in maidenhood, as she sat in a chamber of her hereditary mansion, she heard such a sound of mirth in the direction of the accursed idol's temple, lowing of cattle, shouting of men, with minstrelsy and all kinds of mirthful music, to honour and reverence their heathen gods. She thought, however, as she was patient and enduring, notwithstanding so young thing as she was, what it might profit, though she alone were to strive against so severe an Emperor and all his empire. She stood still a while, and lifted up her heart to the high Saviour that is honoured in heaven. But the angel comforted her, and sweetly said, “Be not thou aught afraid, daughter of the Lord; keep steadfastly to that thou hast begun: for thy beloved and thy Lord, for whose precious name thou hast undertaken this strife, is with thee everywhere, in

"Decollatus est miles, de quo nimirum constat quia csi fonte baptismatis non est ablutus, sui tamen est sanguinis lavaero mundatus, ac regni cælestis dignus factus est ingressu." — Bedæ Hist. Ecclesiast. lib. i. c. vii. § 20.

Katherine answered, smiling somewhat, and said to the King, “ Fair flattereth thy mouth, and thou makest it seem inviting: but I dread that this sweet sound may draw toward death, as doth the mermaid’s.³ But thy flattery and thine anger avail thee equally. It happened that the King, Maxence, had to go on a journey; and he journeyed into the farthest end of Alexandria. The Queen, Augusta, longed to see this maiden Katherine; and called to her Porphyrius, the chief of the knights, and told him a dream that had appeared to her: that she saw this maiden sitting with many venerable men clothed in white, and maidens not a few placed all around; and she was herself among them, as she thought; and

Mr. Ellis, in a note on this passage (vol. i. p. 89), conjectures halwei to be "holy water." It is more probable that this name, written also "helewei," was given to some sweet medicinal drink. Meanwhile, the demon Maxence, the mad wolf, the heathen hound, returned to his royal city. The maiden, on the morrow, was brought before him; and he began to address her in this manner: “It were more to my wish, if thou indeed wouldst, to have and to hold thee living, than to kill thee. Thou must needs, however, speedily elect and choose one of these two: to live, if thou offerest sacrifice to our living gods; or, if thou wilt not, to die miserably.”

Katherine has seen no kind of pain that she had reason to dread. Cause this deed to be done, now that she thus threatens and disputes against thee. arguments vexed him so sore, that he furiously gave orders to behead them immediately, every man, without the city; and to leave all their bodies unburied, as food to wild beasts, and to fowls of the air. His hest was performed, and they were every one beheaded; but, notwithstanding his prohibition, it hindered not that the bodies were taken away during the night, and honourably buried. God would not suffer his martyrs' corpses to lie to perish, who had promised that a hair of their heads should not perish.

The King's thirst was not even yet, with all this blood, cooled: but he ordered Katherine to come speedily before him. The King, as one who was drunken with the devil's poison, wist not what to resolve: he commanded, however, to put her quickly out of his sight, and to behead her without the barriers of the city. She, as they conducted her, looked back again, when she heard a clamour; and saw many heathen, men and women, rushing after her, wringing their hands and weeping sore.
